Now this disposition makes us act against all those in whom this contrariety appears. When therefore it happens that we either really have those qualities, which to some are the object of aversion , or that we make our selves known unto them, only by such particularities, as. give them reason to imagine we have them; it ought not seem strange to us, that their disposition should produce its natural effects against us j it would have done the fame against any other whatsoever, and it is not particularly we whom they hate, tis him in general who has . such and such ofensive qualities. XL. In general, we have an aversion sot those that are covetous, self, interested, and presumptuous i...
