Whether it leaves its host and comes out, presumably a very difficult operation, is not known. Fishes of the great mackerel family are remarkable for their associations; thus many when young live up among the tentacles of the great jelly-fishes. The little fish, Caranx trachnrus, lives up among the tentacles, under cover of the umbrella of the beautiful medusa Chrysam-a isocela). This sea-nettle often incloses several young specimens of caranx, which we are surprised to see issuing full of life from the transparent bodies of these animals. Indeed, it is not rare to find other fishes in the medusae. Dr. Gunther, who has arranged with so much care the rich collection of fishes in the British Museum, has in his possession some specimens of Labra.r lupus, and of Gaslerosteos. which had been obtained from the interior of different medusae; and these associations have been also remarked by various distinguished observers, among whom we may mention Sars, Rud, Lenckart and Peach. The captain of the frigate Jouan, when in the Indian Sea, on October 26th, 1871, about 200 miles to the west of the Laccadive Islands, saw, in very fine weather, the sea. which was at that time very calm, covered with medusa2, and the greater part of these were escorted by many little fishes of the genus Ostracion, the species of which he was unable to ascertain. It is probable that the school of medusa? set in motion certain animals which are eagerly sought...
