Clark, F. C. Hendershott and Frederick Nicholas. The editorials trace the history of the bill, point out that the question is of national importance, and that it is not the result of any movement on the part of the city itself. The pending measure is of vastly greater significance than any similar measure affecting another city. What is done in Washington may be considered as representing the national policy. The bill proposes legislation radically different from the present settled policies of the country. It proposes public ownership by vote of Congress in a district where the residents have no voice to decide whether or not the innovation shall be introduced. It proposes legislation in the conspicuous capital of the country on a subject that is primarily a function of state or municipal government. Such a step...
