I cannot, however, on the present occasion omit a passing tribute to the memory of the great man, the second centenary of whose nativity we all hope this night to celebrate in a manner worthy of his merits, and of the esteem in which they are universally held. To the light diffused upon zoological science by the writings of our immortal Ray, whose comprehensive mind embraced every department of Natural History, and illustrated them all with nearly equal felicity, we are indebted for those clear notions of scientific arrangement, the scintillations of his brilliant genius, on which all our present systems are confessedly founded. If then in later times we cannot produce upon the muster roll of British Zoologists, names which deserve to rank by the side of Linnaeus and of Cuvier; we may at least console ourselves with the reflection...
