The tremulous Nondescript was the first to sense it and he drew in his petals and shrunk almost to nothing. Billion retired at once into his shell, and became part of the seething and all objects, and added to the fullness of their weird beauty. A blue crab passed by, and then an eel. Meantime the hoarse song of the sea robins could be heard where they sought shelter in the trunks of the oyster sloops that lay peacefully at anchor. Billion was now again on the march, for most things sub-marine are awake and active in the bright moonlight. He had reached a pleasant valley in the bed of the Kills, the floor of which was of pure white sand, each crystal shining like a diamond. It is at most times beautiful below the water, but in the moonlight it is like enchanted fairyland. That Billion enjoyed it was shown by the lightening rapidity with which he flicked and waved his feathery antennae. His whole face was replete with expression. At that moment there appeared before him a hermit crab, seemingly like himself, but differing slightly in coloring and in the character of the winkle shell that he inhabited. It is written in the mysterious book of nature that each hermit crab shall regard the habitation of his neighbor as vastly superior to his own, and this strange fact underlies the pugnacity of the tiny creatures...
